We are pleased to continue our association with James & James, publishers of Histories of Schools.

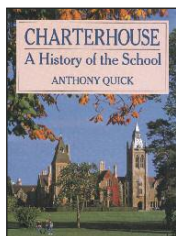

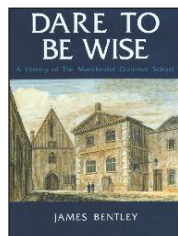

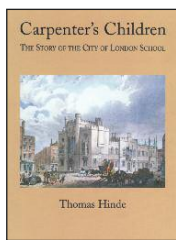

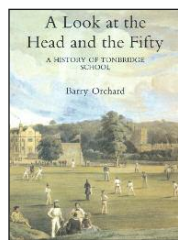

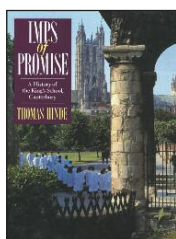

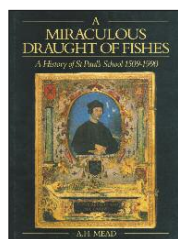

Britain's leading schools are central to the life and history of the nation. They have mirrored social change and in education they have preserved old values and led new experiments. Their alumni have to this day been key figures in government, foreign and military affairs, commerce, the professions, literature and the arts.

But the character of these institutions is remarkably varied. Each is unique in its traditions and background, its Heads, its architecture, its changing fortunes, its eccentricities, its successes and its failures.

James & James' histories are consequently varied in their approach. They do have, however, certain essential qualities in common.

The texts are authoritative, lucid and witty. They are copiously illustrated in colour and black and white with photographs, reproductions of paintings and documents, and engravings. Superbly designed and produced in a large format, they are a significant and entertaining contribution to the history of Britain's society and education.

The Consultant Editor to the series is Sir Brian Young. After 12 years as Headmaster of Charterhouse he became director of the Nuffield Foundation and then director-general of the Independent Broadcasting Authority.
